

see his two children. Accounts of what happened next differ. Miller says Hayman ran out of the house and attacked him, and exhibited a wounded eye to support his statement.

But listen to Hayman. "He called me out of the house and demanded that I pay him for the furniture. I said all right. Then he said that wasn't all. He had to take two lives, mine and my wife's. So I had him arrested."

"Peace bond ought to be enough in this case," said Judge Himes.

"Your honor, I don't like bonds," objected Miller. "I tried the bonds of matrimony, and they weren't satisfactory."

"Well, that wasn't a peace bond, was it?" asked the judge.

"No, indeed, your honor," declared the defendant, excitedly. "Peace and marriage is something else again."

"All right. Sign this and you can go."

Miller signed.

Outside the court room Miller confided to a reporter his views on women, marriage and life in general.

"Young man," he warned, "never get married. If you ever feel that way, buy an automobile. It's just as unreliable, and you can swear at it and break it up without running foul of courts. Never again for me. I'll take that back. If I found a woman about 80 years old with $75,000 I might take another chance, but purely as an investment."

"At present I am a happy man."

Traveling around the country with no woman to be responsible to is the next thing to heaven. And the other way was the next thing to—well, don't get married, and you'll thank me for the advice.

"My boy, I sell spectacles. I sell darn good spectacles, but I never yet sold a pair of glasses that would enable a man to pick out a good wife. Take it from me, stay single."

We promised Mr. Miller to obey his injunction, and late this afternoon were continuing to do so, even though it is leap year.

FACTS THAT TELL THEIR OWN STORY

This is not a news story; nor an editorial; it is merely a simple presentation of facts.

There has been much joy since yesterday forenoon about the ending of the Lawrence textile strike, which we were told, was brought about by "the great concessions made by the mill owners in the interest of industrial peace."

Here are a few facts about the
